Memorial Day exercises were begun promptly as announced by the assembling of the societies at their hall; and taking up the line of march, the firemen were met at Frankfort square and all proceeded to the opera house. Through a mishap, the commander of the Post was not informed, until after the procession had been seated in the opera house, that pupils of the second ward schools were awaiting them at the building, in charge of Miss Gallagher, ready to join the procession. The large hall and stage were decorated with the national colors, portraits of the prominent generals of the war and flowers in abundance,-two stands of arms on the stage being the most Members of Baker Post and visiting comrades occupied the stage, among the latter being M. After music by the band, Post Chaplain McAllister was called upon to invoke the divine blessing.

This was followed by a short address on the "Origin and Perpetuation of Memorial Day" by Robert Craig, of the city school, in which, in plain, strong language, was very briefly told the history of the day and what it means to the American people.

A solo and chorus, "We're Growing Old Together, Boys," was then rendered the memorial services at the opera by C. G. Hickok as soloist, assisted by W. K. Lay, Stephen Buzza and M. K.

Judge W. N. Hensley, the orator of the day, then delivered one of the best addresses of the kind ever heard in the city, full of patriotic feeling; a glowing tribute to the heroic dead, and a plea for fraternity among the living, telling the Sons of Veterans that if they could succeed in perfecting the union as their fathers had preserved it, they would be doing a work equally as great as theirs. The Cornet Band then rendered a fine
